The Dutch East Indies painter Leo Eland (1884-1952) was a successful artist in the first half of the twentieth century, initially in the former Dutch East Indies and later in the Netherlands. He is featured in seminal works such as Indië omlijst (Indies framed) and Beyond the Dutch, but relatively little is known about him.2

Leonardus Joseph (Leo) Eland, painter of ‘Mooi Indie’

Leo Eland was born in Salatiga on Central Java, the son of a Royal Netherlands East Indies Army (KNIL) officer. His father was a Quartermaster and the family mostly lived in remote outposts. As a young man Leo worked for the Topographische Service in Weltevreden, a suburb of Batavia. He became inspired by his friend, the well-known Indonesian painter Carel Dake junior (1886-1946), son of a professor at the Rijksacademie in Amsterdam (Royal Academy of Visual Arts). Despite there being no formal art education in the Dutch East Indies, Eland soon developed a talent for drawing and painting. He visited many places in the archipelago to sketch the Indonesian landscape and nature, to draw with pen and ink, sometimes using watercolours. Later, back in his atelier, he would produce oil paintings by expanding on these often detailed ink drawings. Indeed, his preliminary sketches show many similarities with the final artworks. Eland held his first solo exhibition at the Bataviasche Kunstkring in Brussels, Antwerp, Paris, Milan, Leipzig, and Dresden, as well as at the world Exposition in New York and the Golden Gate exhibition in San Francisco (1939).

He left for the Netherlands at the beginning of the 1920s. There he bought a simple houseboat with an atelier, the Scarab, and he travelled along the Rhine, mooring at exceptional locations to paint the river landscape. The flamboyant artist with his striking face and long hair was quite a sight to behold. In the spring of 1927 he made a tour of North Africa, in particular Morocco. He was struck by the unique light, the warm pastel colours and the Islamic architecture and culture. Eland’s sketchbooks reveal his preference for landscapes and eye-catching figures in pencil, sometimes coloured in with pastels or watercolours. A great deal of study material remains from this trip. His later oil paintings are dominated by dilapidated city walls, gatehouses, kasbahs and mosques with minarets. The street scene depicts traditionally veiled women and men dressed in djellabas on donkeys. Other works show nomads in a vast desert landscape. Eland felt strongly attracted to this fairy tale, Eastern world. In this respect, he had much in common with Dutch Orientalists and painters such as Philippe Zilcken (1857-1930) and Marius Bauer (1867-1932).

Eland’s sketchbooks reveal his preference for landscapes and eye-catching figures in pencil, sometimes coloured in with pastels or watercolours. A great deal of study material remains from this trip. His later oil paintings are dominated by dilapidated city walls, gatehouses, kasbahs and mosques with minarets. The street scene depicts traditionally veiled women and men dressed in djellabas on donkeys. Other works show nomads in a vast desert landscape. Eland felt strongly attracted to this fairy tale, Eastern world. In this respect, he had much in common with Dutch Orientalists and painters such as Philippe Zilcken (1857-1930) and Marius Bauer (1867-1932).

At the end of the 1920s, he temporarily went back to the Dutch East Indies. There he painted the forested slopes of volcanoes, the deep blue mountain lakes and the misty mountain landscapes of Java and Sumatra. His oil paintings and dioramas, three-dimensional and detailed views of tea and rubber plantations, the pepper cultivation on Sumatra and the paddy fields on Java, were exhibited at the large Colonial Exposition in the Bois de Vincennes in Paris (1931). Here, the Dutch East Indies was held up as a model colony. At the official opening, Queen Wilhelmina witnessed a great admiration for Eland’s impressive dioramas and paintings. Unfortunately, the Dutch pavilion burned down on 28 June 1931 and the exhibited works of the Indonesian painter Leo Eland, as well as those of Hendrik Paulides (1892-1967) and Charles Sayers (1901-1943) were lost.

In a short time a new pavilion was installed. A year later, Eland produced an enormous diorama (600m2) for the Indische Koloniale Tentoonstelling (Colonial Indies Exhibition) in the Westbroekpark in The Hague. It depicted the famous Harau Gorge at Pajakumbuh on West Sumatra with its waterfalls, sawas, (fields) and kampongs (villages). This exhibition was opened in May 1932 by Princess Juliana and attracted almost half a million visitors. In the 1930s his star rose quickly. Indeed, Eland caused quite a stir at the international exhibitions in Brussels, Antwerp, Paris, Milan, Leipzig, and Dresden, as well as at the World Exhibition in New York and the Golden Gate exhibition in San Francisco (1939).
The bohemian Eland had a rakish charm and was popular with his clientele in the Hague art world. His canvases show not the daily lives of the colonial administrators or the KNIL military, but especially panoramic mountain landscapes with rising volcanoes streaked with sunlight, rushing waterfalls, gurgling mountain streams and indigo-blue crater lakes with steep cliffs. The natives are often miniscule figures in the dominant landscape. His works are usually recognizable topographic renderings of, for example, the Kari-Plateau and Telaga Lake in North Sumatra, the Kirbouwengot (Pagarai Sianok Canyon) in the Padang Highlands of Sumatra’s West coast, the Pauinger region and the Tangkuban Prahu volcano at Bandung on West Java; and the Batur Lake and the Gunung Agung on Bali. In addition, there are many atmospheric sunrises and sunsets and silvery moonlit lakes and sea views. Other subjects are limited mostly to kampongs, puaars (markets), tea plantations with pickers, vast paddy fields with toiling natives, market goers and trucks laden with genboks (buffalos) on the narrow mountain passes. In the background there are often misty blue mountains.

For his work reveals his particular admiration for the Indies landscape and its inhabitants. In his gallery, always busy with visitors, he hung a permanent exhibition of picturesque, almost paradise-like landscapes. His artwork was a response to the prevailing, sometimes rather conservative, tastes of his buyers and clients. He fits in the tradition of his peers and Mooi Indië artists, such as Hal Wichers (1893-1968), Ernest Dezenzti (1885-1971) and Carel Dake junior. They used comparable themes and styles.

His oil paintings, along with the sketchbooks, ink drawings, preliminary works and correspondence, give an intriguing image of the method of the artist. He spent the first half of his life in the tropics, and subsequently spent twenty years working on his Mooi-Indië paintings in his atelier in The Hague. His impressive oeuvre, now lodged in museum collections and with private collectors, has, in our global age, become a silent witness to a partially vanished world!

Louis Zweers is an art- and photo historian. He is a doctoral candidate at the Erasmus School of History, Culture and Communication, Rotterdam, focusing on the Dutch and international journalists and photographers, the media coverage and the Dutch military information services during the struggle of independence in Indonesia 1945-1949. (zewee@eshoc.eur.nl)

Notes
1 All of Eland’s sketches and ink drawings shown here are part of the author’s collection, unless otherwise specified.
4 Eland had contact with the architect & painter Piet Mienjs (1879-1955), a central figure in the Indies cultural life and director of the Batavische Kunstkring. In addition, he knew Henri van Vollenhoven (1881-1954), artist and founder of the Vereniging van Beeldende Kunstenaren (Association of Visual Artists) in the Dutch Indies.
5 The sketchbooks with their many pencil drawings, sometimes coloured in, and preliminary works that he made during his 1927 journey through North Africa, are in the author’s collection.
8 Eland’s oil paintings (45) can be found in important museum collections, such as the Tropenmuseum (Amsterdam), former Museum Nasionale (Delft) and Museum (The Hague). Paradise Framed (1996), a guide to Indonesian paintings and watercolours sold by auction houses such as Christie, Sothebys, and Graneum, includes 120 works by Leo Eland. The author is currently producing an inventory and research on this oeuvre of Leo Eland, painter of the Dutch East Indies landscape. Private owners of Eland’s work are also being approached by the author.