Tibetan studies in Australia: politics

James Leibold

Researchers in Australia have long made an important contribution to our understanding of the politics of contemporary Tibet. This contribution continues today, with a new generation of scholars shining light on Tibetan society and its complicated relationship with the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and the People’s Republic of China (PRC). Writing over five years ago, Colin Mackerras noted Australia’s surprising strength when it comes to the study of Tibet, highlighting the diverse work of a range of Australia-based scholars.1 In this brief review, I focus on new research related to the politics of Tibet since the publication of Mackerras’ 2011 report.

He Baogang, Alfred Deakin Professor and Personal Chair in International Relations at Deakin University, has a longstanding interest in the ‘Tibet problem’ in both Chinese politics and international relations. His new book draws together a number of previously published articles and new material to explore how democratic governance can offer a viable solution to the place and status of Tibet within China.2 He argues that new forms of democratic governance, whether via the referendum or inclusive referendum, could help solve contentious national issues, such as the status of Tibet and Taiwan.

Ben Hillman at the Australian National University has spent nearly two decades studying the Tibetan communities of Southwest China, exploring ethnic policy and governance issues, as well as the role of patronage and power plays in sustaining CCP rule in rural frontier areas.3 He has been working on a new project that seeks to document the agency and diversity of Tibetan lives in a rapidly changing China. Using a series of ethnographic projects, the project seeks to move beyond stereotypes to reveal the complex ways Tibetans pursue their life chances and the implications for Tibetan identity and culture. Hillman is one of Australia’s leading experts on the politics of ethnicity in China, and has recently teamed up with Gerald Roche and myself to explore how urbanization functions not only as a tool of ethnic governance for the Party-state but also as dynamic sites for Tibetan countermobilization across the Tibetan plateau.4

In my own work on ethnic policy in China, I’ve sought to highlight the unique challenges Tibet and Xinjiang present for Party leaders in Beijing. These two remote yet highly strategic territories possess demographic majorities that share neither the same culture nor belief system as the one billion strong Han ethnic community. While the Party-state claims ‘Chinese’ links with these regions going back centuries, there is a strong memory of recent colonialism that is exacerbated by a heavy-handed, top-down security strategy. While some advocate a second generation of ethnic policies, aimed at weakening minority rights and identities, stability maintenance (wenlian) remains the abiding priority, meaning the current approach of more intrusive governance and state-led developmentism continues to divide Beijing’s approach to the two regions.5

The Melbourne-based independent scholar Gabriel Laffitte has spent most of his life documenting the colonial nature of Chinese rule over Tibet. His 2013 book, Spoiling Tibet, highlights the resource nationalism behind the extraction of mineral resources (copper, gold, silver, uranium, etc) from the Tibetan plateau, and more recently, he has been exploring the appropriation of the plateau’s water resources for bottled water, hydro-electric power and mining.6 Laffitte is currently researching several interrelated projects in the Tibetan context, the most prominent of which is the project ‘Spreading Tibet’, which seeks to document the agency and diversity of Tibetan lives in a rapidly changing China.

In his 2011 book The Buddha Party, Professor John Powers analyses how the Chinese Communist Party is co-opting and re-defining Tibetan religious practices to justify its rule.7 In his new book Buddhism, but Tibetan studies are no longer Western-directed, and are now more inclusive of Tibetan and other scholars. Samuel concluded by asking: “Are we a community at all, and do we have common interests to pursue?” To which he answered in the positive: “Australian scholars of Tibet and the Himalayas, although scattered across many disciplines, depend on each other to maintain the critical mass of expertise that is vital to the production of world-class scholarship.”

Exemplary of the broader, more interdisciplinary nature of ‘new’ Tibetan studies in Australia is the work of Catherine Schuertze. She has been a practicing veterinarian in the Himalayan region for fifteen years and turned to social sciences to develop a better understanding of human-animal relations in the Tibetan context. Sheurtze is currently researching several facets of human-animal relations, and developing methods and concepts in veterinary anthropology. Her approach looks at animals through several lenses and narratives: the place of animals in Tibetan medicine; their place in the perspective of Tibetan herders; the Buddhist commitment to kindness to all sentient beings; and the current state of veterinary practice in Tibet, which, though predominantly concerned with livestock, also has an emerging focus on companion animals. Schuertze is currently training Tibetan veterinarians in companion animal veterinary medicine, as well as training local community groups on their own treatments to animals. Her work also involves recording rituals dedicated to the pacification of local deities and to keeping herd healthy, and other rituals involving animals. Finally, her work involves the compilation of a glossary and bibliography of Tibetan veterinary medicine.

Gillian Tan’s current research builds on her former work in socio-environmental change among nomadic pastoralists of the eastern Tibetan studies in Australia: anthropology

Christine Mathieu

At a recent gathering of Australia’s Tibetan studies researchers, held at La Trobe University on 13 June 2017, Geoffrey Samuel opened the discussion with a presentation on the trajectory of Australian Tibetan studies from the mid-1960s and the visionary work of Alan William Longley and Joseph Kolmas at the Australian National University (ANU). The first official gathering of Tibetan studies in Australia took place at an anthropology conference in Newcastle in 1988, and was attended by David Templeman, Gabriel Laffitte and Geoffrey Samuel. Since then, interest in Tibetan studies has grown exponentially, both domestically and abroad, and has expanded to include all Himalayan regions: Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim, and Ladakh.

Early interest in Tibetan studies originated with what Samuel called the “theosophical fascination with ancient Himalayan sages”, and a perception of Tibet as a sort of “sensational spiritual museum”, insulated from the world. This ‘view up to the plateau’ has now evolved in to a ‘view from the plateau’ – not only has interest in Tibet broadened far beyond Buddhism, but Tibetan studies are now no longer Western-directed, and are now more inclusive of Tibetan and other scholars. Samuel concluded by asking: “Are we a community at all, and do we have common interests to pursue?” To which he answered in the positive: “Australian scholars of Tibet and the Himalayas, although scattered across many disciplines, depend on each other to maintain the critical mass of expertise that is vital to the production of world-class scholarship.”

Exemplary of the broader, more interdisciplinary nature of ‘new’ Tibetan studies in Australia is the work of Catherine Schuertze. She has been a practicing veterinarian in the Himalayan region for fifteen years and turned to social sciences to develop a better understanding of human-animal relations in the Tibetan context. Schuertze is currently researching several facets of human-animal relations, and developing methods and concepts in veterinary anthropology. Her approach looks at animals through several lenses and narratives: the place of animals in Tibetan medicine; their place in the perspective of Tibetan herders; the Buddhist commitment to kindness to all sentient beings; and the current state of veterinary practice in Tibet, which, though predominantly concerned with livestock, also has an emerging focus on companion animals. Schuertze is currently training Tibetan veterinarians in companion animal veterinary medicine, as well as training local community groups on their own treatments to animals. Her work also involves recording rituals dedicated to the pacification of local deities and to keeping herd healthy, and other rituals involving animals. Finally, her work involves the compilation of a glossary and bibliography of Tibetan veterinary medicine.

Gillian Tan’s current research builds on her former work in socio-environmental change among nomadic pastoralists of the eastern...