‘Africa-Asia: A New Axis of Knowledge’
The Second Edition

I was interested in the conference because I was working on North Korea and aesthetic theory, and I was open to any new ideas. The conference was an extraordinary event, enjoyed by so many, both new and familiar participants, and supported by first-time and long-standing partners. The cooperation provided by our local hosts at UDSM was truly exceptional, and the conference would not have been quite so gratifying, let alone possible, without them. More information about the most recent and the first conference, including programmes, speakers, etc. can be found on the website https://africasia.org. Below is just a small selection of commentaries sent to us by attendees, who like us believe that the meeting in Tanzania was a uniquely stimulating and thought-provoking collaborative event. More information about the three conferences will be shared soon, but we hope to see you all there!

Africa-Asia: a ‘New Axis of Knowledge’, to what effect?
Shiree Choi

As a student of international relations, I am not sure if an Africa-Asia axis is necessarily innocent intellectually, politically or historically. However, one thing I am learning in my research and from having attended the second Africa-Asia Conference is that the connection is one that is productive. In the sense that it creates a network, it does not substantially change anything. I am happy I found co-journeyers at the conference and the unresolved financial aspect of this ambitious enterprise, which made its location invisible while all the discussions and reflections were also abundant within the conference proceedings. I found this inclusivity and transparency refreshing; it brought to the fore how research findings do not spring from a vacuum, that it is important to bring into research spaces the machineries of what sustains the gathering, but also the aspirations, what is at stake and concerns of the institution-in-the-making. For instance, the conference’s local convenor, Dr Mathew Senga of University of Dar es Salaam, stressed the importance of ensuring the conference’s local convener, Dr Mathew Senga of University of Dar es Salaam. The conference was an extraordinary event, enjoyed by so many, both new and familiar participants, and supported by first-time and long-standing partners. The cooperation provided by our local hosts at UDSM was truly exceptional, and the conference would not have been quite so gratifying, let alone possible, without them. More information about the most recent and the first conference, including programmes, speakers, etc. can be found on the website https://africasia.org. Below is just a small selection of commentaries sent to us by attendees, who like us believe that the meeting in Tanzania was a uniquely stimulating and thought-provoking collaborative event. More information about the three conferences will be shared soon, but we hope to see you all there!

Africa-Asia: a ‘New Axis of Knowledge’, to what effect?
Shiree Choi

As a student of international relations, I am not sure if an Africa-Asia axis is necessarily innocent intellectually, politically or historically. However, one thing I am learning in my research and from having attended the second Africa-Asia Conference is that the connection is one that is productive. In the sense that it creates a network, it does not substantially change anything. I am happy I found co-journeyers at the conference and the unresolved financial aspect of this ambitious enterprise, which made its location invisible while all the discussions and reflections were also abundant within the conference proceedings. I found this inclusivity and transparency refreshing; it brought to the fore how research findings do not spring from a vacuum, that it is important to bring into research spaces the machineries of what sustains the gathering, but also the aspirations, what is at stake and concerns of the institution-in-the-making. For instance, the conference’s local convenor, Dr Mathew Senga of University of Dar es Salaam, stressed the importance of ensuring the conference’s local convener, Dr Mathew Senga of University of Dar es Salaam. The conference was an extraordinary event, enjoyed by so many, both new and familiar participants, and supported by first-time and long-standing partners. The cooperation provided by our local hosts at UDSM was truly exceptional, and the conference would not have been quite so gratifying, let alone possible, without them. More information about the most recent and the first conference, including programmes, speakers, etc. can be found on the website https://africasia.org. Below is just a small selection of commentaries sent to us by attendees, who like us believe that the meeting in Tanzania was a uniquely stimulating and thought-provoking collaborative event. More information about the three conferences will be shared soon, but we hope to see you all there!